Memory of Daniel O'Connell. [Saturday Review.]

The Italians are too fond of talking as it Genoa was a second Liverpool. The shipping in the whole crowded harbor is about equal to that in one of the larger Liverpool docks. Genoa may be more correctly described as the Clarence Basin or Humber Dock of Italy. The whole value of imports and exports put together is not £16,000,000; so that, great as Genoa is among little Italian ports, some progress must still be made before it becomes a serious rival to a third-rate English harbor. The glories of Genoa are not of the present, but the past, and it may be hoped, of the future. Though its aspect has not that freshness and appearance of good repair which satisfy English eyes in Gibraltar and Valetta it is yet one of the handsomest towns in Italy, perhaps in Europe. A marble quay, bordered by stately mansions, has a tumble-down cottage, covered picturesquely with creeping vines, for its central feature. The main approach from the harbor of the interior of the city is through an alley no wider than Pater noster-row, but composed of houses as tall as the new Law Courts. A street of palaces worthy to set a copy to Pall Mall is, nevertheless, so narrow that two carriages can hardly pass each other, and is wholly unfurnished with the side-paths for foot-passengers. The Exchange, a noble design by Alessi, stands in a dark little court. It contains the statue of a great and successful statesman—one whose career, above that of most others, reminds us that "treason doth never prosper." The statue of Cavour, in all the vulgarity of a modern costume, but too faithfully modeled by a sculptor whose mechanical skill largely exceeded his artistic power, sits in a loggia, whose windows look out, across the little square, upon the inn where another and more noisy, if less successful politician expired. The traveler from our islands will hardly fail to notice a tablet unmentioned by the local guides, since it marks the last resting-place of O'Connell on his fatal journey toward Rome. "Dan- ielli O'Connell vindicti illi iurium civium atque sacrorum Hiberniae suae quum Roman iter haberat in his oedibus cessit a vita," says the inscription, doing full honor to a second rate hero by describing it as "A. I. E. S." The "Liberator's" heart alone reached Rome; his body returned to Ireland, where the round tower at Glasnevin, which marks his grave, serves as a resting-place alike for Fenians and Home Rulers.

English Prices for American Goods. [Philadelphia Press.]

One of the commercial puzzles yet to be explained is the reason why you can buy excellent "Blue Point" oysters in London for a shilling a dozen; why the Atlantic and Scribner's monthlies can be bought there for the same price; how it is that American butter, cheese and beef are now to be found in nearly every village of Scotland and England, while the greater part of the sea-coast population of Wales live on American canned goods, all of which can be bought for far less there than here—a good cut of American beef, for instance, costs two pence, half penny, or five cents a pound.

Developing our foreign commerce is a good thing, but is there any reason why we should not be able to get things produced here for at least the same price that our British cousins can? If the Atlantic and Scribner's are to be bought in London for a shilling, why should we pay more than a quarter of a dollar for them? Or, what is a more vital question, with American beef at five and six cents a pound at retail, why is it that the lowest price in the wholesale market here is seven and one-eighth cents a pound, and that without the added expense of transportation and other incidentals? An explanation is in order from producers.
